David Cordani Interview with Mad Money
19 March 2018

Jim Cramer:

Some stocks just can't seem to catch a break. A week and a half ago we learned that Cigna, the gigantic health insurance provider, is buying Express Scripts, the pharmacy benefit manager, you may know them as a PBM, in a gigantic $67 billion deal. The market's response? Cigna's stock has been crushed. It's come down from $204 to $166 now. And this was already after it had been taken to the woodshed during February's big sell-off. In late January this was a $226 stock. The market clearly does not like this deal, but what if the market's got it wrong? That wouldn't be the first time. Express Scripts has admittedly had a spotty track record, we're gonna talk about that, but Cigna's one of the best run players in the industry—they know what they are doing. So, with the stock getting clobbered once again today could this represent real value here? Let's take a closer look with David Cordani, he is the CEO of Cigna to hear his side of the story. Mr. Cordani welcome to Mad Money good to see you. Have a seat.

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

Good to see you as well. Thank you.

Jim Cramer:

You know there's no such thing as a do-over because it's the stock market, it's not when we're playing kickball in school, but I need you to walk through the rationale, because I think there's a lot of things as I said I know I liked particularly things like accretion. But there's bigger things than just dollars here. So, I'm giving you the floor.

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

Sure, so, we're a health service company and, like you said, there are bigger things than accretion. It all starts with having the right products and services for individuals that are affordable, are of high quality, and help people live better lives. Cigna's been doing that for many years, and with the combination of Express Scripts, we'll be able to that for even more lives and with broader capabilities to keep healthcare more affordable, have higher quality, and connect better with healthcare professionals. That's what the net story is here.

Jim Cramer:

Ok, so let's take it from the point of view first of what some people thought Cigna was on a growth path to do which is that, you know we kind of liked Cigna without an acquisition and didn't really feel that one was necessary, just felt that you were doing so well. What do you say to the people who say, listen man, my Cigna was fantastic. What happened here?

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

I think we'll start with my Cigna was fantastic and still is. We grew greater than 10% for the last 7 years, topline, greater than 10% bottom line, and over 30% shareholder return over the last six years. So phenomenal. But, change and innovation is required and we're an innovative company and this enables us to have more lives to touch and takes capability, pharmaceutical capabilities, which are now 20% of total health care costs, not that long ago they were just 10%, and specialty pharmacy which is the fastest growing health care cost, brings them together to align them with medical, behavioral, population health and our physician alignment program. So, Cigna's going to be even better, touching more lives, and a better partner with healthcare professionals going forward.

Jim Cramer:

I'm coming back for you again. Cigna had a great pharmacy benefit manager. Why do you need another?

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

We do. We built our own and it's been –

Jim Cramer:

Fantastic –

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

So, when you look at this, this is not the acquisition of a pharmacy benefit management company, it's a broadening of capabilities. First, more lives to touch. 80 million more lives. Secondly, the ability to further accelerate the affordability equation so lowering health care costs. Cigna delivered the lowest medical cost trend every year for the last five years, Express Scripts delivered the lowest pharmacy trend last year. And then lastly, expanding distribution you know how important distribution is, selling to more clients, more health plans, and more governmental entities. So capabilities, reach, quality, affordability. That's what this is about.

Jim Cramer:

Alright, so let's take Express Scripts. There are a lot of people who felt, wait a second, these guys? They lost a big customer, maybe they're in a secular declining business –

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

Yeah, we don't see it that way. Take pharmaceuticals as just an example. The number one cause in the gap in healthcare in America, so quality issues typically tie back to a pharmaceutical. The wrong drug, the wrong dose, or the wrong duration. So, it's a high intimacy play with a customer and the healthcare professional. Two, 80 million customers in a growing book of business even with the transitioning client. So, let's come back to your point about accretion. Even including the transitioning client this combination will be accretive in the teens, in the first year. Not second year or third year. In the first year, even after you exclude that transitioning client. So, we've taken that into consideration, we'll have a growing chassis, broader set of capabilities, more lives to impact.

Jim Cramer:

Now, from my point of view why I felt in the 170s it was a buy, was that I happen to have been a long-term supporter of United Health. And I like them because they were outcomes oriented from Optum, in other words they really had a very good database, and of course, they are, like you, a terrific insurer. This company looks to me a lot like United Health when they merged but it's a lot cheaper.

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

I appreciate that, I think we're a great value. So, when you look at United Healthcare, great corporation, great corporation, great series of assets. Our capabilities will have the ability to serve employers, serve health plans, serve governmental entities. Some of the differences that exist with some of the other alternatives in the marketplace: open architected, so the ability to work with a variety of technology platforms; open access, not propriety or owned physician capabilities, partnering oriented – for example, Cigna has 500 partnerships today in the United States with physicians and hospitals; and then choice base, being able to have either digital access or retail access, at home access, or in your physician's office or at a clinic at your employer of choice. So, the ability to have that choice, accessibility and partnership capabilities is what we're all about.

Jim Cramer:

I know the first leg down had to do, a lot of people felt, with this Amazon-Berkshire Hathaway-JP Morgan teaming up, also to find a way to lower health care costs. I know from when you were on Squawk on the Street you've spoken with these folks. Give me the difference between why you may still have a unique selling proposition and maybe unique for the customer.

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

Sure, so when you said the first leg down, so for context wise for everybody, when that announcement took place, Cigna's stock went down a little bit because we're largely, in the United States, an employer sponsored offering, and we've been able to prove we can just grow not just grow, but grow double digit revenue by being a consultative partner with employers and having solutions to help to make their employees healthier, more productive, and therefore make their businesses better. To your point, if that joint venture has legs and takes off they're going to need a service partner and a service provider of choice we'll be really well-positioned whether it's in Amazon or whether it's the Department of Defense. Whether it's health plans or whether it's high performing physicians.

Jim Cramer:

None of these companies feel that you add to the cost—

David Cordani, Cigna President and CEO:

We actually take cost out by improving quality. So, at the end of the day the way to take costs out is to improve quality, the way you improve quality is either improve somebody's health or help them get the best possible care and coordinate that care when they need it with physicians.

Jim Cramer:

Alright, terrific. I'm so glad you came on to explain it. Because I do think, look a stock down, it's such a high-quality company, and you say its accretive. And I get the proposition. Thank you to David Cordani, President and CEO of Cigna. Look, you are certainly not paying the top dollar for it, and I think the rationale as outlined just now, makes a ton of sense to me.
